NATIONAL SEMINAR

Role of University in Social Transformation

(August 30 - 31, 2017)

Concept Note

Universities have frequently been regarded as key institutions in processes of social change and development. The most explicit role they have been allocated is the production of highly skilled labour and research output to meet perceived socioeconomic needs. But to this role may be added, especially during periods of more radical change, roles in the building of new institutions of civil society, in encouraging and facilitating new cultural values, and in training and socialising members of new social elites. The four major functions of universities posited by Manuel Castells (2001) as applicable to all societies to a greater or lesser extent provide a suitable starting point for the analysis that follows. First, Castells notes that universities have historically played a major role as ideological apparatuses, expressing the ideological struggles present in all societies. Second, they have always been mechanisms of selection and socialisation of dominant elites. Third, the generation of knowledge, often seen as their most important function, is actually - according to Castells – a relatively minor one, with functions of scientific research often assumed by specialised national institutes (in Europe and many developing countries) or within in-house laboratories of private firms (for example, Japan). Fourth, the most traditional - and today the most frequently emphasised – function of universities is the training of a skilled labour force (what Castells calls the “professional university”).

The overarching aim of the project is to increase understanding of the various ways in which universities and other higher education institutions generate, contribute or inhibit social, economic and political change.

In the modern world, there are calls for universities to adapt and to respond to the changing character and needs of other social and economic institutions are frequently heard. But what is the role of universities in bringing about wider changes in society? This is the question that the seminar sought to address and to do so in an empirical rather than a normative fashion.

The policy implications of the study are immense. Higher education consumes vast resources and affects the lives of many. In societies where its contribution can be described by expert commentators as ‘stagnation’, the implications for those societies may be considerable. The reciprocal relationship between change in society and change in universities needs to be better understood in order that it may be better managed, to the benefit of both society and university.

Social transformation lies at the radical end of conceptions of social change. It implies at the very least some fundamental changes in society’s core institutions; the society, the polity and the economy, with major implications for relationships between social groups or classes, and for the means of the creation and distribution of wealth, power and status. Within these broad features of social transformation,

The roles played by universities in modernisation projects are varied. It is important to distinguish between examples where the role of the university is largely autonomous and examples where the role is set firmly within state plans and control mechanisms. It is important to distinguish between universities that ‘ignite’ change, those that ‘accelerate’ existing change and those that ‘block’ change. It is important to distinguish between examples of planned and intended changes and examples of the unintended consequences which arise out of university-based activities. And, as we noted above, it is important to be aware of the implications of the role(s) played by the university prior to the period of transformation. .

Much of the recent literature on the roles of universities in processes of transformation and modernisation has tended to be normative: focusing on what universities ought to be doing and what is planned for them to be doing. The hopes and aspirations of politicians and policy strategies are assumed to be achievable realities.

Where the focus of debate is not normative – and is based on empirical study of the workings of higher education institutions – greater emphasis has been placed upon the internal changes within institutions that have been brought about by broader social changes.

Consideration of the role of universities in social change and transformation raises questions of who, what and where. Who gets higher education? (the access question). What do they get (the curriculum question). And where does it lead them? (which is frequently seen as a labour market question but is also a political and status question – more generally, a placement question). To these three questions should be added the question of research and the balance to be struck between intrinsic and extrinsic drivers of its development.

The dynamics of contemporary globalization, nonetheless, involve several of the core forces of social life: rationalist knowledge, capitalist production, automated technology, and bureaucratic governance. Universities, in current periods of social transformation, generally become both progenitors of (usually) and resisters to these forces. Both universities and globalization are sustained by rationalist knowledge, and by encouraging the view that knowledge is more widely gained by seeing the world as a whole. Consequently, both the academy and the global are ‘supra-territorial’ entities and encourage the rationalities associated with the spread of capitalist production, modern technologies, bureaucratic organization, and the law.
